Introduction

School-aged children (7 to 16 years age-group) spend about 30% of their time in schools in many countries. In these settings, they are at a greater risk of injuries and medical emergencies due to the higher level of involvement in sports and extracurricular activities.

Timely administration of first aid in response to injuries and medical emergencies will help to reduce complications, the cost of treatment and mortality among children.

As schools do not usually have trained health care providers on site, it is essential for teachers to be trained in first aid procedures. They also need to be updated periodically in their knowledge and skills to keep up with current first aid guidelines. Teachers must be willing to assume the responsibility for competently rendering first aid to students whenever the need arises.
